Abstract

Shāh Walīullah (1703-1763) ranked among the great leaders of Islamic history who by dint of their knowledge and activities helped reconstruct the socio-political thought in Islam. Shāh Walīullah formed a bridge between medieval and modern Islam in India and pioneered an Islamic revivalist movement during the 18th century in the subcontinent. He devoted his whole life in disseminating the knowledge of the Qur’an and Sunnah to revive Islamic faith and true Islamic spirit among the Muslims. This study seeks to analyze and evaluate the socio-politico economic and religious thoughts and activities of Shāh Walīullah. It is believed that most of the successors of Shāh Walīullah are greatly influenced by the thoughts and activities propounded by him and hence this study will investigate and examine how they have been influenced and motivated by his thought and program of action. The overall objective of this study is to point out the thought and socio-politico economic and religious contributions of Shāh Walīullah towards reawakening of the Muslims in his contemporary society and how his contributions have shaped and moulded Islamic revivalism respectively.

Keywords: Islam, Qur’an, Sunnah, ‘Ulama’, Sufis, Ummah, Mogul Empire, and Irtifaqat.

1.1 INTRODUCTION

Qutbuddin bin ʿAbdur Rahīm popularly known as Shāh Walīullah (1114-1176 AH/1703-1763), an outstanding scholar of Islamic sciences, was one of the great Muslim thinkers and social reformers, and was born in India in the 18th century. He flourished during the decline of the Mogul Empire of India, an era when the Muslim community in India was facing a grave crisis in every walks of life, be it socio-political, religious or economic. This crisis provided Shāh Walīullah with an intellectual irritant and prompted him to discuss the Muslims problems. Based on the teachings of the Qurʾan and Sunnah of the Prophet (SAAS), he urged the ‘Ulama’, Sufis, Muslim rulers and Ummah at large to come back to the teachings of the Qurʾan and Sunnah rejecting all kinds of exaggerations and negligence in religious matters. Shāh Walīullah, employing his research in to the depths of the Islamic tradition, came forward with many pragmatic and bold ideas and, thereby, revived the intellectual life of his community and enriched its cumulative store of ideas. On account of his creative thinking, he put forth a great and lasting influence on the Muslim society of the India subcontinent, which can still be perceived among the academic circles of the country. Today, almost all of the ‘Ulama’ of Indo-Pak subcontinent, despite their different religious affiliations, claim to be belonged to his intellectual lineage. The respect and influence commanded by Shāh Waliullah prompted the followers of various schools of thought to invoke his authority in support of their respective standpoints and attitudes.

2.1 INDIA DURING THE TIME OF SHĀH WALĪULLAH

Before dealing with Shāh Waliullah’s socio-political and religious ideas, it is important to give a clear picture of India during Shāh Waliullah’s lifetime that played an important role to mould his personality. Political situation of India influenced his thought greatly. Economic suffering of masses made him to lead a war in writings against bureaucrats. His encyclopedic work Hujjatullah al-Bāligha is a living document for socio-political and religious condition of India. The religio-cultural situation of India led him to the various dimensions in his life. His journey to Haramayn (Mecca and Medina) was a historic attempt in his life which completely changed his mind and thought. There he came into close contact with several prominent Islamic scholars like Shaykh Abu Tāher bin Ibrāhīm of Medina, Shāh Muhammad Wdūlallah and Shaykh Ibrāhīm Kurdi. He benefited from all these scholars and acquired in depth knowledge of religious sciences. However, the overall socio-political, and economic condition of Shāh Waliullah’s time will clearly be defined in the following discussions.

2.1.1 Social Condition

India, in the history of Islam, has a great significance for its socio-political dimensions. The conditions of the country, during the time of Shāh Waliullah were extremely critical in Islamic history. The power of Mogul Empire was in decline. The social sphere of life presented a hopeless condition for citizenry. The political instability, incapability of rulers, disunity, grouping, infighting, looting, plundering and chaos were rampant everywhere, the self-aggrandizement was the order of the day. The moral values were being trampled under feet. The Muslims, who should have been morally upright and the torchbearers of Islam, had forgotten their duties, and indulged in saint worships, superstitions and many unhealthy practices. The elites were living in extremely luxurious lifestyle and were addicted to music, dance parties and all sorts of undesirable pleasures. On the other hand the masses were being grounded under the unjust economy, and were living under extreme poverty and hardship. Besides, the Shi’ite-Sunnite controversy had taken a very dangerous turn. This enmity that had been suppressed under the strong rule of the early Moguls had then come to the surface under the later Moguls. Consequently this very dispute at last gave the master blow to the ailing Muslim rule in India. This terrible condition of the country and the social disorder of the eighteenth century India was so deplorable that Shāh Waliullah compared it with the times of Persian and Roman Empires before Islam: In Hujjatullah al-Bāligha he mentioned:

“Extremely luxurious living of the high and the ruthless persecution of the low and the poor presented a gloomy and sad spectacle, which was in no way better than what it was in the Persian and Roman Empires before Islam”. (Waliullah Shāh, (1378 A.H.), Hujjatullah al-Bāligha. 2Vols. ‘Abdul Haqq Haqqānī., p.105).

2.1.2 Political Condition

The political panorama in India in the same period was worsening than that of social condition. During the period (1719-1730), the political scenario of India had undergone significant changes in various dimensions. There were political instability and insecurity; thus people had no peace of mind and safety of life. The looting, plundering, and fighting had spread everywhere. The friction and disintegration had set in the Mogul Empire and the Muslims were splitting among themselves. Consequently, they suffered much at the hands of the Sikhs, Jats and Marathas.

The Moguls ruled India for about two hundred years, preserved a momentous remark in the Muslim history of India. In this long period of imperial rule they produced many dynamic rulers who led India towards prosperity and success. Especially, the reign of Aurangzeb (1658-1707) was considered as a golden era for the Indian Muslims for its extensive influence over the Mogul Empire. As a ruler Aurangzeb was unparalleled, at the same time he was pious and very simple in his lifestyle. Historians have shown a great tribute to him for his unequivocal role in the state affairs of Mogul as a successful ruler. Historian Tara Chand points out Aurangzeb as a unique ruler among the Mogul emperors, he says:

“For fifty years Aurangzeb held the reins of an empire unequalled in size, population and wealth among the polities of the contemporary world. In the discharge of his extremely onerous duties he had shown a devotion, assiduity, courage and calmness which remark him out as a unique ruler of men. In personal life he was the model of a good man. He was free from the vices so common among the Asian potentates and princes. He lived simply, nay, austerely. He was abstemious in food and drink, in dress and all the amenities of life. While engaged in the heavy work of imperial administration, he found time to earn money to provide for his needs by copying the Qur’an and sewing caps”. (Chand, Tara. (1970), History of the Freedom Movement in India. Vol.I. New Delhi, India., p.39).
Furthermore, the great nobility of Aurangzeb was known for his devotion to the Muslim religion and observance of Islamic injunctions. It has been manifested in some of his letters written during the struggle for the succession; he claimed that he was acting "for the sake of the true faith and the peace of the realm". Soon after the ascendance of his throne, he introduced some reforms in the state, which could make his dominion a genuine Muslim state. These reforms he had undertaken can be considered as the key success for his peaceful time and S. M. Ikram spotlight the reforms as follows:

"After his (Aurangzeb) second (and formal) coronation on June 5, 1659, he issued orders which were calculated to safety orthodoxy. He appointed censors of public morals in all important cities to enforce Islamic law and he tried to put down such practices as drinking, gambling, and prostitution. He forbade the cultivation of narcotics throughout the empire, and in 1664 he issued his first edict forbidding sâlîf or the self-immolation of women on funeral pyres. He also repeatedly denounced the castration of children so they could be sold as eunuchs. In the economic sphere he showed a determined opposition to all illegal exactions and to all taxes which were not authorized by Islamic law. ... in 1668 he forbade music at his court and, with the exception of the royal band, he pensioned off the large number of state musicians and singers". (Ikram, S. M. (1964). Muslim Civilization in India. New York., pp.189-190).

In 1707, when Aurangzeb, the third son of Shah Jahan died, his successors began to loose their control over the province of the empire. The capital, Delhi had witnessed calamities of bloodshed in the royal palace, the years 1716 to 1719 saw three puppet kings succeeded one another on the throne and more than ten rulers ascended the throne one after the other during Shâh Wâliullah’s lifetime. He was a boy of seventeen, in the same year (1719) when the ruler Farrûkhshîyar was slain and Muhammad Shâh ascended the throne of Delhi. (Wallūlah, Shâh. (1335 A.H.), Anfâs al-‘Ārifīn. Delhi. p.158). Consequently, these tragic dramas, the death of Aurangzeb, defeat and disintegration among the emperors weakened the Mogul Empire and gave rise to the resurgence of regional powers. G. Allana remarks:

"After the death of Aurangzeb, the Mogul Empire was heading towards its decline, and the weakening of the Central power at Delhi had given rise to the Marathas to challenge the Mogul Emperors in open battle. The rise of the Maratha power ignited the imagination of the Hindus, who saw in its success an opportunity to lay the foundation of a Hindu Empire in Bharat". (Allana, G. (1983). Eminent Muslim Freedom Fighters 1562-1947 Twenty-one Great Lives. Delhi., pp.11-12).

The success of the plundering and marauding armies of the Marathas had done irreparable damage to the socio-economic structure of India, and "The prosperity which had been built up by long years of ordered and benevolent government lunder the diligent care of the Mogul Emperors was once again destroyed by anarchy and disorder. This period played a considerable part in creating the conditions of chronic poverty of the Indian masses". (Qureshi, I. H. (1974). Ulema in Politics. 2nd ed. Karachi., p.29. Quoted in G. Allana., p.12.) However, with the rise of Ahmad Shâh Abdâlî on the scene and his military successes, the Marathas received a severe setback.

During the reign of Forrukhshiyar (1713-1719) the Jats, who inhabited between Delhi and Agra and conformed their presence on the political horizon of Mogul Empire, constructed forts for themselves and fully equipped with firearms started road robbery, and revolted. The Jats became ever more rebellious during the time of Muhammad Shâh. (Muztar, A.D. (1979). Shah Wali Allah: A Saint-Scholar of Muslim India., p.43).

The rule of Muhammad Shâh (1719-1748) was comparatively longer. He was known as a pleasure seeker and drunkard and on that account he was given the title of "Rangîla"; (a Persian word, which means joker-indulge in all sorts of pleasures and fun). The houses of the nobles had turned into breeding places of illicit love affairs, and the crown of the once mighty Moguls had become just like a toy in the hands of the enterprising parties of the royal court. Consequently they ignored the real Islamic way of life, and hence fell into bankruptcy morally and spiritually. Meanwhile, the new powers, the Sikhs and the Jats, had arisen high on the political horizon of the country challenging the decaying authority of Muhammad Shâh, the ruling king on one hand, and the Marathas who had already affirmed their presence on the political arena of India. In this unpleasant situation, they were well prepared to reap benefit from the confusion and weakness of the Mogul Empire.

The rise of these rival forces encouraged the half-hearted loyalties at the court to turn into an open revolt. All this dealt and impressive tragedy to the administrative machinery, and it was smashed into debris of disorder, causing a severe storm to the royal prestige. (Muztar, (1979), p.43).

In 1739 Nâdir Shâh of Persia, having conformed the unsettled condition of the south, marched to invade Delhi. Nâdir’s defeat of the Indian army and massacre and plunder of the capital destroyed the prestige of Mogul government and ruined it financially. This also encouraged the rebellious forces of Mogul Empire and even the provincial governors became defiant. Addressing Muhammad Shâh in a letter from Kabul, Nâdir Shâh had stated that he had occupied his northwestern territory “Purely out of zeal for Islam”, so that in case, “The wretches of the Deccan” again moved towards Hindustan, he might “send an army of victorious Qizilbash to drive them to the abyss of Hell”. (Ikram. S. M. (1988)., p.260). He had, in fact, given a death wound to the Mogul Empire. The massacre and the plunder done by Nâdir Shâh has been expressed by Tara Chand in the following words:
“When Nādir and his officers began a systematic loot of the prominent and the wealthy and extorted money by heaping on the people indignity and torture, great anger was aroused. A small incident created a tumult and Nādir gave orders for a general massacre. Streams of blood ran through the streets, and fire indemnity, and seized gold and silver plate, jewels, the Peacock Throne, precious treasures collected by the emperors for several generations. Numerous elephants, horses and camels and some fifteen crores of rupees in cash were carried away”. (Chand, Tara. (1970)., pp.44-45).

During the reign of Ahmad Shāh, the son of Muhammad Shāh, the Jats attacked Delhi, and they took away what they could lay their hands on. Shāh Waliullah and his neighbors were, however, saved from the devastation. This shows how weak and helpless the government had become. Shāh Waliullah mentioned this tragic state of affairs in one of his letters, which he wrote to Hāфиз Jārūllah Punjabī when the later was in Hijaz for pilgrimage. (Nizami, K.A. (1950). Shāh Waliullah kē Siyāsī Maktūbāt. Alligarh., p.52).

In 1757, the Marathas captured Delhi, but the triumph did not last for long. Four years later, the third Muslim victory at Panipat led by Ahmad Shāh Abdālī, the founder of Afghanistan, crushed for all time the power of the Marathas in northern India. (Abbott, Freeland. (1968). Islam and Pakistan. New York., p.74). But the degenerate Mogul Empire could not in any way profit by it. On the other hand, the conquerors of Plassey reaped the fruits of the rout of the Marathas at Panipat. The advancing tides of British Imperialism swallowed up all the conflicting factors in the Indian polity and the chances of restoring the Muslim supremacy in India became very remote. (Yasin, Mohammad. (1958). Social History of Islamic India 1605-1748. Lucknow., p.176). Consequently, in last of eighteenth century, the British began to establish their supremacy over both Muslims and Hindus.

2.1.3 Economic Condition

India once considered as a very prosperous country for its peace and natural resources. During the time of Mogul Empire, it enjoyed tremendous economic strength. People from all over the world flocked into India to share its property. This economic prosperity continued until the period of Emperor Aurangzeb but the successors of Aurangzeb could not maintain it for long. The economic condition of the country in the days of Shāh Waliullah became extremely bad and hence constantly affected the morality of people. There were, however, many causes for the deterioration of the economic condition. Some of the reasons can be traced as the following:

1. Incapability and irresponsibility of the rulers as well as their immorality had deteriorated and disintegrated the Empire. Consequently, the whole government machinery became inefficient. This disintegration of the central authority had a damaging effect on the economic life of the empire, whose revenues were decreasing at an alarming rate. Security on the roads, so essential for the free transaction of trade and industry, had been badly affected, and eventually resulted to depress the economic prosperity of the people. (Rizvi. (1980). Shāh Wali-Allāh and His Times. Canberra., p.179).

2. The economic gap between the ruling elites and the ruled, especially poor people widened dramatically. The rich continued to exploit the poor and the weak, with the result that wealth remained limited in the hands of few persons. The influential and the ambitious people lived a life of extreme ease and comfort. For example, the ladies in the Qamaruddin Khān’s (the Wazīr of King Muhammad Shāh) household perfumed their last bath with rose water. (Rizvi. (1980)., p.179). This brought inequality within the masses and resulted in unrest and misery for the lower class, the downtrodden Even, mere survival for the poor people became extremely difficult.

3. Heavy taxes were levied upon traders, artisans and labourers. Moreover, the Jāhirdārī or feudal system sucked the blood of the workers just to add to the luxuries of the owners of Jāgīrs. (Rizvi, (1980)., p.42).

4. Reduction in the area of Khālīsa (Persian word, ie., the areas from which the revenue passed directly to the imperial treasury were known as khālisha) territory badly affected the state exchequer. Improper distribution of labor also had badly upset the economic order. (Jalbani. (1978). Life of Shah Waliyullah. Lahore., p.59).

Besides these, there were some other evils, which had shaken the economic system completely. Shāh Waliullah was an eye-witnessed of this deplorable condition and hence, for an improved and reformed economy, he thought it was necessary that the basic necessities of life be provided to the people. The welfare state, to him, is such a state where the necessities of the people are secured. And the establishment of such state can be visualized only when every man works with his own hands to earn his living, and not be a burden on others and the state. (Waliullah, Shah. (1322 A. H.). Hujjatullah al-Bāligha. Vol.I. Cairo., p.25). Shāh Waliullah therefore, felt an urgent treatment of this tragic economic situation of his country. Shāh Waliullah said:

“A corrupt government which neglects satisfying the basic needs of life should and must be overthrown by hook and crook. If it is allowed to continue, its corruption will spread like a cancer first in some members of the administration, which, if it is not cut out from its very root, will go on spreading till the whole body will disintegrate”. (Waliullah. (n.d.), Tafhimat-i-Ilahiyyah, Vol.II. Hyderabad., pp.170-171).
2.1.4 Religious Condition

The religious condition of that time was far from satisfying. The life that the Indian Muslims led was radically opposed to the real spirit of Islam and its teachings. People were divided into sections and sub-sections, each one happy in his own set of beliefs without any regard as to what was true and what was false. (Waliullah. (n.d.), Tafhim-i-Illahiyyah, Vol.II., p.171).

The jihād was totally stopped and consequently, no research and investigation were made even by the scholars in the matters of religion as to solve the problems emerging from time to time. They stuck to blind imitation, with the result that they failed to face the hard realities. Hindu Vedantism, the Shiite tendencies and the mean innovations had prevailed upon them. The aspects of the preachers were always blended with unsuitable hints of mysticism, which led them astray from the right path. The holy Qur’an was recited and simply kept covered in precious cloth. The opinion of the Imam was preferred to the prophetic traditions when the former was found in clash with the latter. Serious thinking and independent approach to the law were recklessly ignored with the result that they fell an easy prey to superstition and innovation. (Waliullah. (n.d.), Tafhimat-i-Illahiyyah, Vol.II., p.200).

Mystics (Sufis) were void; they had no knowledge of the Qur’an and the Sunnah. Despite that, their views were preferred to the plain words of the law. In the gatherings of the elite and the educated, mystical practice, mystic poetry and the hints of the mystics were the hot topics. Consequently they became spiritless and lethargic. Rationalism and philosophy had considerably influenced the people; thus doubts were nurtured in their minds about the truth of religion. Therefore, they began to test everything at the touchstone of reason. Such was the religious conditions in the days and country of Shāh Waliullah. (Jalbani. (1978)., p.130).

Likewise, the controversies between the Shiites and Sunnites had placed them in the opposite camps and had grown in them the seeds of disunity and prejudice. (Jalbani. (1978)., p.130). With the immigration of large numbers of Shites from Iran because of the encouragement of extended by the Moguls, the biggest cause of strife had come to be sectarianism.

The installation of Muhammad Mu’azzam with the title of Shāh ‘Ālam Bahadur Shāh marked a departure from the strict orthodox Sunnite policies of his father. Such a change would have had to occur regardless of which prince had gained the throne. Immediately after his association with the throne, with the suggestion of his Wazīr, Mun’im Khān, he ordered that in the Khutba (Congregational sermon) the word “Sayyid” (descendant of the Prophet Muhammad (SAAS)) should be added to the list of his titles. He then ordered that the form of Khutba delivered in Aurangzeb’s reign should be changed. Bahādur Shāh did not anticipate that the new Khutba would in any way offend orthodox Sunnite feelings but the latter considered that the emperor had become a Shiite. With the exception of Ahmadabad, Delhi and Lahore, the Khutba was recited everywhere. (Rizvi. (1980)., p.113). At Ahmadabad the Sunnite governor, Ghāziuddīn Firōz Jang ordered the Emperor’s instructions to be obeyed, but the Sunnites refused to accept his ruling, rebelled and a Punjabi killed the Khutib (recite of Khutub) of Ahmadabad. (Rizvi. (1980)., p.113).

The Muslims of Lahore protested vehemently against the new Khutbah. In addition to this opposition, the citizens of Lahore and the Afghan troops stationed there also resented and supported the movement of Sunnite leader Hājī Yār Muhammad. However, the Emperor himself tried to implement the new Khutba with force. (Rizvi. (1980)., p.114).

From the above point of view, it seems that the rise of Marathas, Jats, Rajput and Shiks against the Mogul emperors and their governors were motivated by political ambition to extend their power and control over large part of the empire in one hand. On the other hand, the Muslims were seriously demoralized themselves by disagreement. Disunity, commotion, sectarian fight, greed and deviation from the true teachings of Islam. All these hazardous and deplorable socio-political and religious panarams of Muslims were witnessed by Shāh Waliullah.

2.2 THE SOCIO-POLITICAL VIEWS OF SHĀH WALĪULLAH

Shāh Waliullah was socio-political reformer in true sense and a religious mentor, whose grasp of exoteric spiritual ideas was to be revealed for the generation of the Muslim community. His role as the great reformer (Mujaddid) of his century, however, was not confined merely to reforming the religious and mystical life of the Muslims. His ideas for the implementation of Islamic law throughout the Muslim world were comprehensive and included not only religious matters but also took into consideration the social, ethical, economic and political lives of the Muslims. This has been clearly manifested in his writings.

Shāh Waliullah was the first Indian Muslim who, in the worlds of ‘Allama Iqbāl:

“Felt the urge of a new spirit in him”. (Iqbāl, Sir ‘Allāma Muhammad,. (1965). The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam. Lahore., p.97). Within a few decades after his demise this new spirit, of which he had caught the first glimpse, became fully articulated and assumed the form of a socio-political challenge to the Muslim society and demanded a complete reconstruction of its socio-political and religious attitudes.

According to Mawdūdī:

“Shāh Sāhib (Waliullah) was the first scholar who ever understood and appreciated the real and fine differences between the history of Islam and the history of Muslims. He, in fact, has studied the history of the Muslims from the

The decline of Mogul empire and the social dislocation in the Mogul capital of Delhi during the eighteenth century had a great impact on Shāh Waliullah which prompted him to undertake his vast reformation of entire Islamic system. Analyzing the conditions, then prevalent, Shāh Waliullah preferred to fight with his pen rather than with his sword. He launched a vigorous and impartial attack against all the groups, particularly, the so-called ‘Ulamā’ and the Sufis who considered themselves as the upholders of Islam and the repositories of Divine mysteries.

His method in the religious matter was based upon the concept of harmony not only between reason and revelation but also between these two and the intuition. He therefore, asserted that his ideas were supported by reason, intuition, wherein lies the criteria of the inner recesses of the human mind and sound healthy tastes. At the same time, they are also supported by naqî i.e. the Qur’ān and Sunnah, by outstanding Islamic personalities, and by the history of human societies. (Mawdūdī. (1963), p.81).

2.2.1 SOCIAL VIEWS

Shāh Waliullah focused the structure of a social philosophy on the basis of a moral system under the heading of Irtiḥāq. (“Irtiḥāq” means a work done collectively and with cooperation). In this connection he discussed subjects like organization of family life, social etiquette, politics, judiciary, taxation, civil administration and military organization etc., and also spotlighted those causes, which help in the disintegration of a civilization.

The most outstanding and distinctive characteristic of human society, according to Shāh Waliullah, is justice, which is both an individual and a collective quality. Shāh Waliullah recognized justice as an essential moral trait of human consciousness, argumented more on collective manner than the individual level; because, moral decay is more disastrous and may even prove fatal when it extends to the society as a whole. Moreover, Shāh Waliullah’s perception of justice encompasses the entire spectrum of diverse human pursuits: “When ‘adālah (justice) is expressed in dress, manners and mores, it is ‘adab (etiquette). When it is maintained in income and expenditure of the state, it is called politics”. (Siddiqui, ‘Abdul Hamid., (1983). Renaissance in Indo-Pakistan: Shāh Waliullah Dehlawi, in A History of Muslim Philosophy. Karachi., p.1560).

Shāh Waliullah started his exposition of social evolution theory from the very early stage of human society. In his study he remarked that the need for food, shelter and sex is common to all man in general. The knowledge of how to meet these various needs is inspired by Allah to every human being in his innate nature. So, an instinctive knowledge of how to deal with these natural demands is similarly possessed, even by the insects, birds and other lower animals. The building of a hive by a swarm of bees, their working under on common chief, their sucking the flowers and gathering honey-all these are the result of their instinctive knowledge in these methods. The small ants know similarly by their very instinct how to assemble foods for the future, and the small birds know what to live upon, how to build nests, how to defend themselves and to multiply generation. In short, for every species there are certain laws that regulate its life and control its destiny, of which an instinct knowledge is enjoined into its individuals by their own nature. On submission to those laws depends the continuity of their race. (Waliullah. (1996). Hujjatullah al-Bā’ligha. New York., Trans., by Marcia K. Hermansen. “The Conclusive Argument from God” E. J. Brill, Leiden., p.115).

First, social welfare and sound reasoning: It may be said that, in the case of animals the direct realization of some material ends, such as the satiation of hunger and thirsts, etc., is the only motive for their action. But in the case of man the realization of these low material ends is not all in all. In many cases the consideration of some higher and nobler end is his chief motive. For instance, the establishment of a good order in the stat; the attainment of perfection in character and culture, salvation in the hereafter, and the acquisition of name and fame. (Waliullah, Shah. (1996). Hujjatullah al-Bā’ligha. New York., Trans., by Marcia K. Hermansen. “The Conclusive Argument from God” E. J. Brill, Leiden., p.115).

Secondly, cultural accomplishment: The bare fulfillment of a need is the only motive with the animals. But man is not always merely contented with bare fulfillment of his natural wants. He wishes to do a thing in a polished and refined manner, so that it may be more pleasant and delightful. For example, he seeks delicious dishes for his food; luxurious building for his residence, elegant dress for clothing, beautiful wife for mating and so on. This urge is termed by Shāh Waliullah as Zarā’fā i.e. wit.

Thirdly, perception of utility: The beastly arts and ‘sciences’ are designed only to meet economic and subsistence needs while the human sciences are sometimes directed towards the attainment of spiritual perfection and physical accomplishment.

Man aspires for perfection through the attainment of knowledge. But all men are neither equally capable in terms of knowledge nor every knowledgeable person has the aptitude for the same kind of knowledge as others. It is only the most intelligent among them, whom Allah has bestowed with various capabilities, by which they, after continuous experiment and endeavor, discover these methods; and as soon as these are discovered, people accept them wholeheartedly. (Walliullah. (1996)., pp.115-116).

A general knowledge of the fulfillment of the necessities of human life is inspired, of course, into every individual by instinct, but details and progressive methods are discovered by the scientific researches of ages and centuries. Thus, instinctive knowledge supplemented by the empirical knowledge of the scientists and great thinkers which is followed by the people because on this code the empirical knowledge of the scientists and great thinkers which is followed by the people because on this code depend their life and prosperity. This knowledge, however, is the mainspring of all progress, without which empirical knowledge is impossible. And since it is an essential factor, it exists in one way or another in every individual, and is subject to further development by experience.

2.2.2 Concept of (irtifāq)

Shāh Walliullah’s concept of society is systematic. Society in his observation is not an assemblage of units but a living organism, in which various parts are interlinked and interdependent and their movement is interactive. It is subject to health and soundness, advancement and progress, regress and weakness, and decay and death just as coordination and integration of the various faculties of the human organism. Thus, these mutual coordination and integration act as essential elements to make up a healthy and sound social unit. As the life of the individual may roughly be divided into four stages, namely childhood, adolescence, manhood and maturity, so, for the sake of convenience, Shāh Walliullah classified the emergence and formation of society into four stages as well. When a society is born, according to this theory, it passes through four stages until it reaches perfection. These stages are termed by Shāh Walliullah as irtifāq. Before going to discuss the details of the four stages of social evolution theory of Shāh Walliullah it is necessary to see how the previous scholars have defined the term ‘irtifāq’.

The word ‘irtifāq’ is derived from the root (rafq), which means to be gentle, soft, gracious, courteous or civil and to serve. (Elias, A. (1982). Modern Dictionary (Arabic-English). Beirut). The ways and means by which, with little trouble and in short time, one can tide over his social and economic difficulties are called irtifāq. In other words irtifāq means a work done collectively and with cooperation. Therefore, ‘irtifāq’ i.e., gentleness or the use of gentleness, which means that, though the beneficial things abound in the world, they do not come to man for his use on their own accord, but he has to approach them with gentleness. (Jalbani. (1979)., p.165).

More recently, Jacque Berque writes that it seems possible that, the plural of the verbal noun, irtifāq, may be translated by “uses, commodities, services”. Berque further reads a rather socio-economic slant into irtifāqāt by the institutional section of the “collective good” (al-Maslahah al-‘Amma). (Kamāl. (1959)., p.94). It appears therefore, that this term may encompass all of these connotations depending on context and does not have a simple English equivalent.

2.2.2.1 The Four Stage of irtifāqāt

The doctrine of the irtifāqāt occupies an extremely important position in the Walliullah’s social evolution system. His social concept of irtifāqāt has attracted much interest among contemporary scholars of his thought. Shāh Walliullah was one of those few thinkers, who are known for their consistent and systematic approach to problems, with a comprehensive and all-rounded treatment of the subjects taken up for discussions. Some scholars have said in this respect that he was greatly influenced by his predecessors like al-Fārābi (d. 339 A. H.), Ibn Sina (d. 428 A. H.), al-Ghazālī (d. 505 A. H.), Ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728 A. H.), Ahmad Sirhindi (d. 1034 A. H.) and others.110 But the term (irtifāq) in his usage is unique varies contextually.

Walliullah studied the structure, and formulated a theory for the preservation of Muslim society. He divided the history of the growth of the civilization into four stages.

2.2.2.2 The First Stage of irtifāq: i.e., the primitive society

The first stage irtifāq is that of primitive society which has a minimal code of social behavior. The urges of food and sex are basic human urges, which ensure the continuation of human existence on earth. Food keeps man’s body intact while the sex-urge preserves the human race and regulates generation. Allah has also inspired mankind to build shelters to live in and to defend himself against the weather. These needs are common to all men who have an innate desire to excel in the modes of acquiring them. For this purpose different ways and means are adopted which include the use of agricultural methods, cooperating with each other, adopting civilized style of speech, cooking and monogamy. When society achieves these requirements of social development it acquires the first degree of its perfection i.e. the first \textit{irtifāq}. An instance of this primitive stage is the life of Adam. As Allah has created him with a specific purpose that was to be His vicegerent on earth.

“God’s intention in creation of Adam was that he should become his vicegerent on earth and attain his specific perfection. As regards his being prohibited from eating from the tree, the prompting by Satan of evil thoughts, his being reprimanded and finally, his expulsion from the Paradise, all these were a form of the world of similitude to that of morals”. (Khatoon, Saeeda. (1984). “Shāh Waliullah’s Philosophy of Society- an Outline”, in Hamdard Islamicus. Vol.7, no.4., p.59).

The development of \textit{irtifāqāt} in human society is in line with human nature. He strives to achieve perfection in a gradual style. From the level of animal his intellect develops and evolves encountering all the needs he is forced by nature to step further for development. These needs can be divided mainly into two categories: physical and spiritual. To fulfill his physical needs he looks to his surroundings where he would like to find, for instance, food and drinks of his taste, would desire beautiful women, descent dress, a house for shelter etc. On the other hand, man needs spiritual fulfillment as well. But he is inherently unable to guide himself spiritually on his own, which is why Allah sends messengers to the human society from within in order to save them from any kinds of impediments, and guide them spiritually as well. These messengers or leaders act as agents of Allah being naturally capable of a higher king of perfection in bringing law and order to society and curing it of evils and removing obstacles. (Waliullah. (1996)., p.120). They live a life of prosperity and decency and are prepared to work for the development of civilization. The rest of the people are to follow them. This king of human stage is considered to be the keystone of man’s social life, because no group of persons, however small it be, or dwellers of remote and far-flung areas, can be found free from this initial stage of social organization. In other words, this stage is of such a nature that it is absolutely necessary for people to abide by it, for without so doing, it is not only difficult but also impossible for them to lead a social life. (Jalbani. (1979)., pp.168-169, cf. Hujjatullah al-Baligha. (1322 A. H.), Vol.1., p.40).

2.2.2.3 The Second stage of \textit{irtifāq}: i.e., the life of cities and towns.

While, in the primary stage, the requirements are rude and unpolished, in the secondary stage they are more refined and polished as expansion to the former with behavioral knowledge and good morals. By means of dividing them into different classes such as domestic, social, and political etc., and testing them in the light of sound experience, high morality and the common welfare, they are rendered into such forms as make them better, more beneficial and less harmful. Therefore, the chief difference between the requirements and principles of the two stages is one of degree rather than of kind. When these first requirements are met in its refined and sophisticated way according to Shāh Waliullah, they need five sciences to usher in the second degree of social perfection. These requirements and the five sciences embraced together constitute the second degree of perfection, i.e. the second stage of \textit{irtifāq}. The five sciences are:

1. Economic wisdom: As stated by Shāh Waliullah, it includes the adoption and utilization of edifying manners, new experiments and modes of eating, drinking, dress, domestic habits, dwelling, etiquette, sitting, walking, sleeping, enjoying conjugal life, travelling, the rules of cleanliness, of conversation, of medical treatment, of foresight, of festivities, of fellow-feeling, and of removing the death, etc. when those requirements, Shāh Waliullah views, are met in the proper manner and in the light of past experience it gives to rise to economic wisdom. All civilized people observe the above-mentioned items, in some form or other and all great thinkers have tried to find out the best possible form of observing those conventions from their respective angles of vision. The naturalist, for instance, has given more importance to the natural side of these conventions. The astrologer has put much stress on the effects of the stars, while the divines have applied the principles of good and evil to decide is best form. This is why, there are so many ways followed by different people. (Waliullah. (1996)., pp.121-122).

2. Domestic wisdom: This wisdom shows the ways and means of preserving good relations amongst the different members of the family (society) in the secondary stage of civilization. It refers to married life, rearing children, protection, slavery, the right and responsibility to relatives, management and manners of companionship etc.

3. Earning wisdom: It means that everyone should pursue a distinct and separate activity appropriate to his energies and faculties, such as agriculture, trade, crafts of fellah, carpenter, smith etc.

4. Business wisdom: it includes matters of dealing, purchasing and selling, exchanging gifts, tenancy and hiring, landing, incurring debts, loans, or mortgage and so on.

All these five social wisdoms have a great bearing on the economic life and activity of a society. This shows the extent to which Shāh Waliullah gives importance to the economic dimensions of the social development. The second irtifāq is the most important in the process of the perfection of a society and its role is more fundamental. If the second irtifāq is duly achieved, its perfection in the remaining degrees is easily attainable. If these five wisdoms are practiced in a sound and suitable way give birth to innumerable developments in culture and civilization. These are various branches of mutual dealings. In some form or other, are found among the citizens of every civilized state throughout the ages. Besides, being interrelated with each other, these five departments unite the members of society, giving the society the character of a single family, i.e. Ummatī conception, on a large scale. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.70). The second stage leads to a third one, which represents the pre-political stage of social organization.

2.2.2.4 The Third Stage of irtifāq: i.e. nationalism

When these five wisdoms interact with the moral human excellences they give rise to the third degree of social development. This irtifāq is mostly based on cooperation of men so as to achieve the outcome of the five wisdoms. Without cooperation these sciences can neither be put into practice nor produce the expected results. Cooperation is very much needed because men are not equally endowed with all sorts of qualities to work for the society. They include fools, the wise, the wealthy, the poor, the one who is capable of earning, and the one who is not. Some of them are practicing small and ordinary professions and the others do high professions, while some others have several commercial undertaking and the others are unemployed. It is just a composite figure of various professions. If these people do not co-operate with each other in realizing their socio-economic objectives their socio-economic life will be no effect. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.90).

The interaction of the five wisdoms with each other and with the moral excellence and mutual cooperation naturally leads to the emergence of a socio-political organization-Madina or state. Madina is not merely a city, if the citizens of a group of cities and towns have this interaction and cooperation their group will also be termed as Madina. Every Madina has a unity, which must be preserved in its original and perfect form, and its benefits should also be accomplished.

This unity and perfection can, in fact, be maintained and accomplished by Imam i.e. the government or the ruling group in Shāh Waliullah’s terminology.

The state is not confined to its boundaries, its marketplace or its edifices. The state in fact, means a special kind of relationship among various groups. This relationship is imperative and is necessitated by the five principles of the second irtifāq. When these groups cooperate with each other for the realization of the five wisdoms and carry on transactions and interact with each other they become like a single individual and works as a living organism. And again this unity and the organism necessitate the further evolution of society, which takes place in the direction of creation and development of a congenial government. This “corporate” individual undergoes health or illness arising from outward and inward causes. To remedy this corporate individual, i.e. the state, from its illness and to protect its health the congenial government should act as a competent and skilled state physician. The schemes for this do not only aim at safeguarding, preservation and conservation of society, its unity, state and government, are also conducing to the fullest benefit that the unity and the state and government can handle to the members of the society. (Waliullah. (1970)., pp.90-95).

This stage of social development is called the third irtifāq, i.e. the first stage of political organization or the state. This is the third stage where Shāh Waliullah has discussed the qualification of the Imām or ruler and the details of the government agencies. This, however, will be discussed later on in the political views of Shāh Waliullah.

2.2.2.5 The Fourth Stage of irtifāq: the caliphate

And the final stage of social development where several states (Mudun Kathira) exist at a time, disagreements arise and illnesses infect the body politic of the states. Then a superior physician (tābīd al-atibba) is required to cure these inter-state diseases; he may also be called Imām al-a‘immah. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.64). Elsewhere the Imam al-a‘immah has been termed as Khalīfah. (Waliullah. (1322 A.H.)., p.37). This is the fourth stage, which is, in fact, and elementary form of international politics. Defining the fourth irtifāq, Shāh Waliullah says:

“It is the science (hikmah) which discusses the policy of the rulers and kings of the states and the ways and means of the preservation of co-ordination and relationship existing among the people of various countries”. (Waliullah. (1322 A.H.)., p.37).

This seems to be the social idea of Shāh Waliullah, and it is only after achieving this stage of socio-political development that the system of caliph can be properly established.

Shāh Waliullah compared this situation with the state of emergency which once necessitated the Israelites to ask their prophet Samuel for a king. (Waliullah. (1996)., p.137). (See Samuel 8,19), “Send us a king so that we may fight in the path of Allah”. (Al-Qur‘ān 2:246). The caliph’s function is naturally to see that the heads of the city-states administer justice properly and do not wage war against one another. (Waliullah. (1996)., pp.138-139).

It is now clear from the above discussion that evolution and relativity are the prominent marks of the social philosophy of Shāh Waliullah. Furthermore, he conceived and presented the evolution of society like one organic entity, and did not regard it as combined unties, held together by any external force, or artificial means of social contracts, but as a real living organism. It follows the laws of its own evolution. It has an end and a purpose. It works on lines almost parallel to those of the individual, who is subjected to states of health and ailment, progress and regression, life and death. Therefore, it is very much suitable to say that the sociological aspects of Shāh Waliullah’s thought, as Saëeda Iqābāl remarks, is more in line with the spirit of the age, which is methodical, consistent and systematic. (Iqābāl, Saëeda. (1984). Islamic Rationalism in the Subcontinent. 1st ed. Lahore., p.118).

So, in short, the first irtīfāq represents the most primitive societies or to be more specific the pre-social human existence. The second irtīfāq represents the pre-political stage of social organization. The third and the forth irtīfāq are the stages of political organization of society.

2.2.2.5 Morality and Ethics

The whole socio-political aspect of Shāh Waliullah is based on morality and ethics. Ethics according to Shāh Waliullah is a science of ‘nature’ in the sense in which all beings behave and act in accordance with their specific nature. He opines that normal and healthy human beings are naturally drawn to the fulfillment of their natural needs. Lack of natural qualities, such as weak, distorted or perverted dispositions, or corrupt and harmful conditions and customs in society can effect the conduct diversely. Thus, Shāh Waliullah’s concept of socio-political evolution is completely based on ethic or natural science. The principles of morality and conduct in the opinion of Shāh Waliullah are universal, comprising the whole of humanity, particularized as some sorts of essential mode of conduct, which constitute righteous customs. Every society has its code of ethics based on righteous custom, which differs from people to people and evolves with the change or times. In spite of variations in details the ethical codes have certain identical basic principles; these are the needs of the individuals and society, the fulfillment of which is essential for the survival and development of humanity. These needs evolve with the evolution and development of society.

“In the beginning human needs are simple but with the advancement and development of society they become complex and multiple; though the complexity and multiplicity arise out of the development of the original simple needs”. (Iqābāl, Saëeda. (1984)., p.118., cf. Hujjatullah al-Baligha, pp.39-41).

These needs must be satisfied for the preservation, survival and development of the individual and society. Because, with the development of society physical needs are enjoined with the social, cultural, and intellectual aspects as a whole. Thus, ethical conduct in Shāh Waliullah’s view is that conduct which provides an effective means for the survival, preservation and welfare of society and its members, and is conducive to the progressive life that human beings are destined to attain.

2.2.2.6 Economics

In regard to economic conduct, Shāh Waliullah first drew the importance of a standardized living. A higher standard of living and provision of comforts of life are essential for a progressive society, in which these are as important as the psychological, social and other ends. Production of commodities and specialization in arts, crafts and industry are essential for higher standard of living and economic welfare depends on development in industry, trade and commerce. He points out that:

“It is essential for the economic welfare of society that no one, so far as possible, should remain idle, making no contribution to the welfare of society. The drain on the state treasury or on people’s property caused by such people is detrimental to the state economy as to the welfare of society and is not only uneconomical but unethical”. (Waliullah. (1970)., pp.90-91).

Shāh Waliullah regarded economic justice, as the basic requirement for the realization of the objective of ‘adālah’, in every human assembly. Economic justice is, therefore, necessary for a healthy and balanced development of human society. Every social group needs an economic system, guaranteeing material necessities of life to all members. Without these necessities, human beings cannot remain satisfied. And without satisfaction, they will not find sufficient leisure for the pursuit of higher purposes of life, and it is very likely that they turn oblivious of the eternal bliss of Hereafter. (Sindhi ‘Ubaidullah. (1965)., Shāh Waliullah aur Unki Siyāsī Tahrīk. Lahore., p.41).

The requirement of mutual aid, to him, is the main ground for the prohibition of mysīr (gambling), and ribā (interest); he says:

“You should realize that maysar is unlawful gain., and is not in keeping with civic spirit (tamaddun) and mutual aid (ta‘āwn). Equally, ribā constitutes... unlawful gain; for, as rule borrowers are people fallen into a severe state of indigence, mostly not able to pay their debt in time.....When this way of earning money takes root, it leads to the abandonment of agrarian trades and skilled crafts, which are fundamental means of earning a living (in a healthy) society...Both ways of gain (i.e., maysar and ribā) are tantamount to inebriation, as they are flagrant contradiction with the principles Allah (SWT) has laid down for earning a livelihood”. (Waliullah. (1378 A.H.), p.116).
While Shāh Waliullah emphasized the role of moral and spiritual factors in the well being of society, he did not ignore the economic essentials. He looked upon economic stability as a sine qua non for the moral well being of society. When wealth and means of production, he declared, come to be concentrated in a few hands in any society, a reaction sets in and paves way for a revolution. (Waliullah. (1378 A.H.) p.116., ch. 11/28, pp.48-49).

To reform the social complexity he says:

“When societies attain a state of complexity, they necessarily develop a delicate equilibrium which it is necessary to maintain in the interest of the healthy society. This equilibrium (tawāzun) can be maintained only through justice (‘adl)” (Qureshi. (1974), p.124, cf., Hujjatullah al-Baligha. (1378 A.H.) Vol.I., pp.82, 87, 90, 99).

Thus it would be seen that two basic urges, which create society, are economic and political. The first is based on the necessity of the production of commodities required for an easier sustenance of life, and the second emerges because activity is impossible without society. Both demand a continuous adjustment between the rights of individual vis-à-vis the health of the society. The maintenance of a proper balance in these spheres is the prerequisite of equilibrium in a society. This would show that whereas the motive force behind social organization is economic, its health can be guaranteed only through justice, i.e. the prescribed Zakāt based economic system, which is essentially a moral concept. The binding force of society, therefore, is moral.

In fact the maintenance of justice is a complex matter, practically when all aspects of social and personal morality get involved. It is for this reason that Shāh Waliullah considered moral reformation necessary for curing the ills of a diseased society.

2.2.2.6 Social Customs

According to Shāh Waliullah, social customs function like a heart in a society, either drawing people to Allah or keeping them separate. (Waliullah. (1378 A.H.), Hujjatullah al-Baligha, Vol.I., p.178.) In his Last Testament, Shāh Waliullah warned his fellow Muslims to stay away from the mores and customs of Hindus and urged to observe the customs of their Arabian ancestors; he said:

“As a mark of gratitude for these blessings we should, as far as possible, not abandon the customs and mores of the early Arabs, because they were the immediate followers of the Prophet Mohammad (SAAS). We must not adopt the mores of the Hindus or of the people of ‘ajam” (People of Muslim countries beyond Arabia). (Waliullah. (1973), al-Maqala al-Wadiyya fi al-Nasiha wa al-Wasiyya, translated with an introduction by Hafeez Mulik. (1973), in Muslim World, no., 43, p.115).

One full chapter of his book Tafhimat-i-ilahiyya is devoted to describe the evil customs, which the Muslim community had come to be habituated. His basic call to the Muslims was: “You are free to live wherever you desire, but at the same time you should not give up your own culture and way of life. You should take pride in your own religion and culture and give up those practices, rituals and beliefs which are un-Islamic”. (Waliullah. (1290 A.H.) Wasiyat Nāma. Lucknow., p.24).

Shāh Waliullah listed such evil customs and un-Islamic practices, which ruin Muslim community, as follows:

“Hostility to remarriage of the widows, large dowries and other ceremonies which led to wastefulness.” He also denounced, as extremely wasteful, practices like the “witnesses of proposal and acceptance of marriage-bond and Walima” (at marriages) which used to be considered as essential, and “playing drum and other musical instruments and wearing of gaudy garments” in big parties etc.

He added that some Muslims instead of employing themselves with purposeful pursuits, take to the profession of music, vocal and instrumental or dance or play Shatranj (chess), or go for hunting and pigeon-flying; these activities ruin the community. He refers to such idle pursuits as having been prohibited by Muslim law, “because they lead to overlooking of worldly concerns, and so essential duties are ignored. If interest in such pursuits persists, Shāh Waliullah urged, the people would become a burden on the state and would pay no heed to their own reforms”. (Umar, Muhammad. (1993). Islam in Northern India during the Eighteenth Century. New Delhi., p.31. cf. Hujjatullah al-Baligha., (1378A.H.), Urdu trans. Vol.I. pp.137-139). On the other hand he recommended the practice of archery, horse-riding, lance-throwing and stick-playing etc., (Umar. (1993), cf. Hujjatullah al-Baligha, (1378A.H.), Urdu trans, Vol.II., pp.335-336). for such martial exercises were necessary for the protection of the country.

In fact, Shāh Waliullah did not want the Muslims of the Indian subcontinent to permit their cultural affiliations with the rest of their coreligionists in the world get corrupted. He was very particular that even in seemingly small matters of dress, behavior, style of living and speech they should not identify themselves with the rest of the population of their habitat. (Waliullah. (1390 A.H.) Wasiyat Nāma, p.7). This is because a foresighted man must be able to see the dangers inherent in the Muslims giving up any part of their culture and getting identified with the local population that would ultimately result in their absorption into the local milieu.

2.2.3 POLITICAL VIEWS

Shāh Waliullah did not see religion and politics separately. As a scholar of Islamic sciences he conceived religion as a way of life, and in his Hujjatullah al-Baligha he successfully strived to present Islam as a code of human life, spiritual as well as temporal. Matter and spirit do not make any contrast in his system of thought. Khilālah. relates to both of these aspects, and as man is the Khalīfah (vicegerent) of Allah on earth, he is duty-bound to carry out the demands of Khilāfah.

According to Shāh Waliullah, it is collectively incumbent (Fard Kifāya) upon Muslims at all times to elect and install a Khilāfah possessing the requisite qualifications and preconditions. To support this contention he gave several arguments that can be summed up here. (Waliullah. (1378 A.H.) Vol.II., p.111).

First, the collective reason of mankind requires that a Khilāfah should be there to look after interests which otherwise cannot be protected.

Secondly, the Khilāfah is appointed to achieve the two categories of objectives. The prophet (SAAS) was also sent to achieve them. Therefore, after the Prophet (SAAS) passed away, a Khilāfah or Imam was needed to succeed him and implement his injunctions and commandments.

That is why obedience to the Amir or Khilāfah is equal to obedience to the Prophet of Allah and his disobedience amounts to disobedience to Allah. This fact has also been stated in a few Ahadith quoted by Shāh Waliullah in this context:

“Whosoever obeys the Amir (commander of the faithful) verily he has obeyed me; and whosoever disobeyed the Amir, verily he disobeyed me”. (Sahih al-Muslim, (1955) Vol.III., p.1466. Kitab al-Iman).

“The Imam is a shield from the back of which one fights and protects oneself; if the Imam commands to fear God and guides (to the right path) his will be a big reward for this; if he orders other than this he will bear (the burden) of it”. (Sahih al-Muslim, (1955) Vol. III., pp1471).

“Whosoever sees in his amir something unpleasant he should take patience; because there is no single person who parts with the community even a single inch and dies who does not die a Jahili (anti Islamic) death”. (Sahih al-Muslim, (1955) Vol.III., p.1477).

Commenting on this last Hadith, Shāh Waliullah says that it is the distinction of Islam that it provides two categories of objectives for the achievement of which the Khilāfah is appointed as the successor of the Prophet: otherwise the system would resemble the Jaahiliyya. (Waliullah. (1378A.H.), Vol.II, p.112).

In Izalat al-Khafa’ he has also mentioned another Hadith which considers to be the clear textual commandment (al-Nass) in this regard, Prophet (SAAS) said:

“Whosoever dies and there is no oath of allegiance (bay’ah) in his neck he dies a Jahili (anti Islamic) death”. (Muslim, Vol.III., p.1478).

Apart from these Ahadith, Shāh Waliullah argued that the establishment of Khilāfah was due to given the importance to appoint immediately after the death of the Prophet (SAAS) and even before the funeral of the Prophet (SAAS). Upon the Khilāfah develops the following: the Jihad, the administration of justice, the revival of Islamic science, the establishment of the pillars of Islam, the defense of the Darul Islam, and such other things which have been collectively enjoined upon the Muslim Ummah.

(Waliullah. (1979), Izalat al-Khafa, Vol.I., p.2). These are the arguments advanced by Shāh Waliullah, to justify the institution of the Khilāfah.

Unlike the early political thinkers of Islam, Shāh Waliullah makes a distinction between Khilāfah Zahiriyah (succession to the Prophet (SAAS) in the spiritual matters). This distinction is absent in the political discussions of as late a political thinker as even Ibn Khaldun. Shāh Waliullah is, perhaps, the first Muslim political scientist who has so elaborately dwelt upon making a distinction between the two kinds of Khilafahs. For a clear idea of Shāh Waliullah’s conception in this regard a passage may be quoted here:

“In the life of the Prophet (SAAS) there is a noble model for all his followers. For those who are his successors in the affairs of state they have these duties: the enforcement of Islamic law: making arrangements for jihad; the fortification and security of frontiers; granting gifts; sending embassies; the recovery and allocation of Sadaqat; taxes and revenues; the adjudication of disputes; the protection of orphans; the supervision of Waqt properties of the Muslims; the construction of road, mosques and other buildings and similar matters. Those who are engaged in these services and occupations are successors of the Prophet (SAAS) in matters of this world.

The successor in spiritual matters and those entrusted with teachings of Islamic law, the Holy Qur’an, and the traditions or with enjoining what is lawful and forbidden,; those whose words strengthen the true religion, either through polemics and discussions as was done by the Mutakallimun or through preaching their company and spiritual guidance and training serve Islam and Muslims as is the case with the Sufi-saint; or those who arrange for prayers or pilgrimage or guide the people towards piety. These we call spiritual successors of the Prophet (SAAS)”. (Ikram. S.M. (1957). Shāh Waliullah in a History of the Freedom Movement. Karachi., Vol.I. pp.495-495).

Hence, it shows that the outer caliphate relates to the temporal and the inner caliphate to the spiritual aspects of life. The Khilāfah (ruler) as the head of the Muslim state, in true sense, is the man who embodies in his personality the virtues of Khilāfah as a whole. (Waliullah. (n.d) Tafhimat-il-Ulūhiyya, Vol.I., pp.8-9). He says, the outer caliphate would be responsible for securing order and stability, whereas, the inner caliphate would guide the ruler spiritually and instruct the community accordingly. In a flawed political order, Shāh Waliullah sought an important role for the religious leadership, the kind of role he himself exemplified in advising rulers, guiding the community, and safeguarding the intellectual heritage.

Shāh Waliullah did not believe in monarchical rule. From the study of his works, such as Izalat al-Khafa and Hujiatullah al-Baligha etc., it is established that, in spite of his living in the age of monarchical government he had no faith in monarchies. To him the empires of the Sassanid’s of Persia and the Roman of seventh century A.D. were analagous to the Mogul Empire of his days in corruption and social ailments. While describing the socio-political evils that had crept into the body politic of those ancient empires he remarked:

"In the presence of all that you see in the lives of the Kings of your times there remains no need of telling the stories of your". (Waliullah., (nd), Tahim-t-ilahiyya, Vol.I., p.225).

Shah Waliullah defined the Khalifah in the following words: "It is the general authority exercised on behalf of the Prophet (SAAS) for the establishment of the Din through the revival of religious sciences, establishment of the pillars of Islam, carrying out the jihad and what pertains to it of organizing the armies and paying the soldiers and allocating to them the pay. Administration of justice, implementation of Hudud (or capital punishments), elimination of injustices, enjoining the good and forbidding the evil". (Waliullah. (1976). Vol.I., p.2).

Shah Waliullah viewed that the Muslim political leader is the Khalifah (vicegerent), elected or selected. And again, he divided the Khalifah into two categories: The Khalifah-i-khassah (special vicegerent) and the Khalifah-i-amnah (common vicegerent). To all intents and purpose, argued Shah Waliullah that elevated to the Khalifah-i-khassah was sent to fulfill the functions of messengers (rusul). He tried to prove that the Khalifah-i-khassah had been confined to the first two successors of the Prophet Muhammad (SAAS). However, the Khalifah-i-amnah was dependent on traditional conditions outlined by orthodox Sunni jurists and political theories. (Waliullah. (1976) 'Izlal al-Khafa', 'an Khalifat al-Khulafa, Vol.I., pp.18-19).

Shah Waliullah had given procedures for the appointment of a Khalifah. According to him Khalifah is established by one of the following four ways:

1. Through the Bay'ah (oath of allegiance) by the people of loosing and binding from amongst the 'Ulama', quads, leaders, army commanders and eminent people having opinion and well-wishing for the Muslims as was established the Khalifah of Abu Bakr (R).
2. Thorough the will of the outgoing or departing Khalifah. The Khalifah has to nominate the most highly qualified person among all the possible candidates as successor. He has to declare this choice to an injunction in this connection. This was how 'Umar, the second Khalifah was chosen.
3. Through the Shura (mutual consultation) of a certain group as was established the Khalifah of 'Uthman and even 'Ali.

However, it seems that Shah Waliullah does not consider these four means as being inflexible and the method of electing a Khalifah is not confined to these four methods. He argued that the most important consideration in this regard is the pleasure of the masses with the person concerned as their caliph, their consensus on him and their respect and honor towards him. If he enjoys the confidence of the masses and establishes the Hudud, defends the Millat (nation) and implements the commandment of Islam, he is the Khalifah in whatever way he might have become Khalifah. (Waliullah. (1378 A.H.), Vol.II, p.111).

Shah Waliullah opined that Khalifah-i-'Amma and the Sultan (king) were interchangeable terms. (Waliullah. (1976)., pp.,574-610, cf. conditions of the appointment of Imam in al-Mawardi. A. H. (1978) al-Ankam al-Sultaniyah, Beirut, pp.6-22). He agreed with the Ahadith relating to the prohibition of rebellion mentioned in the works of hadith, such as Sahih of Muslim, but stressed the following three conditions under which rebellion was permissible.

1. Should the caliph refuse to obey the rules of the faith and turn apostate, rebellion against him is the best form of jihad.
2. Should the caliph killing his people, plunder their property and rape their women, he and his followers then come under the category of robbers and as such it was imperative to defend the people and annihilate such tyranny.
3. The war against the caliph who clearly violated Islamic laws permissible in order to establish the law of Shari'ah.

Shah Waliullah has given some basic guidelines for a caliph to be observed such as:

i. Should not involve himself in problems, purely for worldly motives, nor should he destroy his followers through war in order to collect riches.
ii. Should please the majority of his supporters an try to benefit each individual iii. Should not expect from a person more than his natural ability could fulfill.
iv. Sould also use both persuasion and threats to prepare them to fight the enemy. (Waliullah. (1976)., pp., 574-577).

2.2.3.1 Qualifications of the Caliph

According to Shah Waliullah the state affairs will not be put in order unless the majority of the influential people agree to obey a person who has his own supporters and is able to compel them to follow the prescribed law. Shah Waliullah discussed under his third irtilaq about the qualifications of caliph and listed a number of virtues, which he should possess. According to Shah Waliullah, Khalifah should be brave in the face of opposition from his rivals and forcefully assert his prestige among his subjects. However, a Khalifah, if not affable (halim) and wise would be unable to carry out his policies, and would ruin his Khalifah by reckless administration. Moreover, Shah Waliullah added, he should have highly developed senses of sight and hearing and should be well known and of such distinction as to arouse universal respect. Shah Waliullah urged that unless the Khalifah was endowed with such virtues the rationale behind his appointment was meaningless; however, if he possess them and failed to nurture them his subjects would still become alienated. Every action of a Khalifah should be directed towards enhancing his dignity. (Waliullah. (1976)., pp.92-94). In regard to state affairs, no hasty step should be taken until the offendor is clearly proved. He should be very kind and encouraging to the selfless and sincere government officials. (Waliullah. (1976)., pp.92-94). In short, the ruler should be of an enlightened nature and foresighted, possessing of insight as to understand the inner self of a man at his very sight, and at the same time able to know the result of state affairs before their actual happening and so on.

Besides, there are some other necessary requirements in the system of the government of the state in work for the safety and progress of the state.

1. Judiciary: Dispute and disagreement among the people of a state is unavoidable. Their unity jeopardizes when stinginess, envy and disregard of rights enter into social life. Hence, the state is in great need of an acknowledged institution available, to which one may resort for an equitable settlement of disputes. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.71).

2. Executive: When people of perverted disposition and destructive activities predominate over other people and begin to influence them, the stat becomes depraved and disordered. There should, therefore, be a strong body to take deterrent and punitive measures against such people.

3. Military or defense: People may take to violent activities such as murder, rebellion, and robbery, and may desperately try to disturb the peace and order in a state. In order to tackle such violent situations and preserve the state from their danger, a defense force is essential in the form of an army of brave people. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.72).

4. Public welfare and public works: The state is in the need of some sort of institution to look after the welfare of the people as:
   a. To find out ways and means of doing the work which people are unable to do themselves like marrying orphans, protection of their properties, the distribution of alms among the needy, the division of an inheritance among heirs etc.,
   b. Construct public buildings and public works, for example, the construction of fortresses, walls, markets and bridges etc. this institution off the government is called Nuqaba; and the head of the institution is Naqib, or Wali, according to Shâh Waliullah. (Waliullah. (1970)., p.71).

2.2.3.2 Moral and Religious Education

Besides these, moral and religious education is essential to create a healthy and decent society. Sincere faith and true religion cannot dispense with an informant, the both of them are based on such clear proofs that rational people find way to them by themselves. However, the numerous people of corrupt nature who follow their lustful desire and oppose the truth, are in need of a man of wisdom, a guide of religion and preacher who can urge them to cultivate noble qualities to manage the house properly and to conduct themselves correctly towards others. (Waliullah. (1996)., pp.132-136).

According to Shâh Waliullah, the reason that prompted Allah to create Islamic community originally was mainly a political one. Allah wished that no religion superior to Islam should exist on earth and that Islamic laws including those regarding different forms of punishment should be adhered to wherever people lived a communal life. In this regard, he stated that, “the chief reason for fixing the blood-money for killing an infidel at half that of killing a Muslim was necessary in order to firmly establish the superiority of the latter, moreover, the slaughter of infidels diminished evil amongst Muslims”. (Waliullah. (1996)., p.440).

2.2.3.3 Shâh Waliullah in the Contemporary Politics

Shâh Waliullah as a great socio-politico religious reformer could not remain mum to the politics of his times. He seemed to have been dismayed by the intellectual and moral degeneration of the Indian Muslims, which ultimately brought the downfall of their political power and caused socio-economic backwardness. To bring about an intellectual revolution he devoted pages of his works towards suggesting his community to return to the glorious days of the Khulafa'-i-Rashidin and also to save the Muslim rule in India. He earnestly wished to see the political power in the hands of Muslims. Hence, he was very concerned to prevent the decay of the Mogul Empire. However, it should not be construed that he was a supporter of Mogul dynasty. He had no hope of the revival of the Mogul imperialism. He neither was linked with it nor desired it. He simply wanted to arrest its decay till a better substitute could be found for it.

In his political thinking he was a realist. According to him the state of political well being of a country could only be attained when ethics, politics and economics stood in complete intimacy with one another. Similarly, political decay could not happen only because of the government errors, rather each section responsible for it. We can find in his book Tafhimat lengthy addresses made to the people representing almost each and every section of his community. (Waliullah. (n.d) Tafhimat-i-Ilahiyyat, Vol.I., pp.282-288).

In those addresses he rendered constructive criticism of their errors and for gross negligence of their respective duties enjoined on them by ethics and the law of the land and earnestly hoped for a change.

Shâh Waliullah’s interest in the socio-political affairs of his country was the result of this own aptitude as well as the influence of his family surroundings. He had studied the history of human society with special reference to the history of the Muslim world. (Mawdudi. (1963), p.81). Al-Budur al-Bazigha, Hujiatullah al-Baligha, and especially Izalat al-Khafa’ were the outcome of his life-long studies of the socio-political history of the Muslims. His study of man and matter was not confined to India. He had had an opportunity of travelling abroad. During his visit to Arabia he studied the socio-political conditions of the land. He had met people from various parts of the Muslim world and discussed the affairs of their countries. Referring to his experience of the socio-political conditions of the Muslim world he wrote:

“The affairs of the people of India are not hidden to me, for this country is my birth place and my abode. I have also heard about the affairs of the people of other Muslim countries from trustworthy men”. (Ahmad, Abul Khair Muhammad bin. (1309 A.H.)., p.63).

Shâh Waliullah belonged to a family that had a profound knowledge of political affairs of the country. His great grandfather, Shaykh Mu’azzam was a Mansabdar (officer in charge) at the Mogul court and became the lord (Jagir) of Shikohpur. His grandfather, Shahik Wajihuddin was an army officer of Emperor Shah Jahan, who sided with the Prince Aurangzeb ‘Alamgir in the squabble of succession among the sons of Shah Jahan. Even after his retirement he took an active part in the political affairs of the country. His father, Shaykh ‘Abdur Rahim was a compiler of Fatwa-i-‘Alamgiri. Though he kept himself away from the court; yet it is reported that he had a great insight into the political development and trends of the country. Some of his political predictions recorded by Shâh Waliullah bear ample testimony to this effect. (Waliullah. (1335 A.H.), Anfâs al-‘Anfîn. Delhi., p.63).

Shâh Waliullah’s knowledge of socio-political conditions of India and his family background of long political experience could not fail him react to the rapid changes that were taking place on the political arena of the country. He was an eyewitness of the decay of Mogul Empire and rising of the rival forces of Muslim India such as the Jats, Shikhs and Marathas.

It was under these disturbing conditions that Shâh Waliullah took a keen interest in the politics of his day and decided that he should have a mission to bring about changes in the socio-political set up. He was inspired with the conviction that Allah had made him the spokesman (nātiq), the guide (hādî), the philosopher (hâkim) and the ‘pivot of his age’ (qâiyûm al-zamân). (Waliullah, Shah., (n.d.), Fuyûz al-Haramayn. Delhi., pp.89-90). Aided and strengthened with this conviction he believed that it was his duty to remove the abuses of his time.

It is worthy to mention here that it had been a common practice of the past among the prominent scholars and spiritual guides, to communicate through letters with their students, disciples and leaders in their country. They used this medium to educate and guide their addresses on various issues of current significance, and also to maintain personal liaison with them. In this connection, Maktubat (letters) of Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi, Maktubat of Sayyid Ahmad Shahid, Maulana Ashraf ‘Ali Thanavi’s letters to Quaid-i-A’zam Muhammad ‘Ali Jinnah, ‘Allama Iqbal’s letters to Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi, and Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi’s letters to Maryam Jamiilah are some examples out of several others.

Shâh Waliullah also frequently wrote letter to his students, friends and notables of his time. Out of a large number of these letters some were preserved in the two volumes of collection prepared by Shâh Muhammad ‘Ashiq, a cousin brother in law and close friend of Shâh Waliullah. This collection was further enlarged and edited by the former’s son Shâh ‘Abdur Rahman who was also a student of Shâh Waliullah. The letter brought the number of these letters to 352. (Ghazi, Mahmood Ahmad. (1982), ‘Political Letters of Shâh Waliullah’ in Journal of Pakistan Historical Society. Vol.30, (April), Part II., pp.87-88). A useful selection of political letters had been made from them by Professor Khaliq Ahmad Nizami, which he first published in 1951 from Aligarh, India. His later brought out another enlarged and edited version of his collection, containing some forty letters, with his introduction and Urdu translation in 1969. (See, Nizami. (1950) Shâh Waliullah ke Siyasi Maktubat).

These letters of political significance were addressed by Shâh Waliullah to the compiler Shâh Muhammad ‘Ashiq and some other notables, rulers and kings of his time. They along with other works of Shâh Waliullah, provide an important source for the study of his political ideas, in the context of the socio-cultural environment of India at the time of their writing.

It would be useful to notice here, some important features of the political statements, contained in these letters, how far Shâh Waliullah’s response to the political life of his country was in harmony with the ideas he expressed in his writings.

From Shâh Waliullah’s works it is evident that he regarded the entire Muslim world as a single entity, even though it may have been under the regime of different political set-ups, independent and exclusive of each other. This is explained by the fact that Shâh Waliullah invited the rulers of other countries to the political and military intervention in the affairs of India to reform its deteriorating conditions. (Nizami. (1950), pp.42-46). This attitude of Shâh Waliullah appears most pronounced in his letter to Ahmad Shah Abdali (d. 1772 A.D.), the founder of modern Afghanistan, informing him about deplorable decay in the state of India. Shâh Waliullah appealed to this dreadful military commander and ruler of the neighboring Muslim country to bring his armies into India, in order to subdue the forces of anarchy and disorder created by Jats, Sikhs and Marathas, who organized the militant ethnic communities among Hindus. (Nizami. (1950), letter no.2. pp.6-17).
The letter written to Ahmad Shah Abdali was the ever-longest letter of Shāh Waliullah among the letters, which he wrote to the political figures of the eighteenth century. This letter not only appears to us as the great political insight of him, but it also furnishes with an interesting study of his knowledge of the geography and politics. At the outset of the letter he narrated very briefly the history of the establishment of Muslim rule in the country. In the beginning of his letter, Shāh Waliullah briefly described geographical and political condition of India in such a way as could be useful only to an invader coming from outside the country. A native ruler hardly needed such information. He then pointed out in his address that this large country has been ruled by the Muslim kings with their capital Delhi over many years by appointing their governors in the provinces. The provinces are Gujerat, Ahmedabad, Thatta, Bengal, Oudh, Malwa and the Deccan had separate governors. And again, this Deccan consists of five states, which governed by the separate governors. Besides, there was another country in the subcontinent, which had never been governed by the Muslim kings, was Rajputana. The Muslim rulers only contented themselves by reducing it to their slavery. (Nizami. (1950)., p.48).

After this description of the political division of India, Shāh Waliullah has shown that the threats under which the Delhi kingdom lived were neither seemed to be from the provincial governors of Delhi nor from Rajputana. Rather the Marathas and the Jats posed the real danger to the Muslims. Therefore he felt necessary to take immediate action against them and save the Muslims from the consequences.

Informing Ahamad Shah Abdali about the military position of the Marathas, he wrote that to defeat the Marathas was an easy task, for the number of real Marathas was small. The bulk of their armies were composed of mercenaries who could not be expected to fight jealously for their employers. They did not excel in bravery or military equipment either. But still they had created the greatest mischief. (Nizami. (1950)., p.48).

Shāh Waliullah then proceeded to give an account of the Jats, along with the brutalities and humiliations that they had inflicted upon the inhabitants of Delhi, especially the Muslims. Describing briefly the origin and the rise of the Jats, he wrote that the Jat community, agriculturists by profession, lived in-between Delhi and Agra. Since both of these cities had served as the headquarters of the Mogul kings, people living in between them were not allowed to keep arms. Emperor Shah Jahan had issued orders prohibiting the Jats to ride on horseback, carry a gun or construct a fort for themselves. But with the passage of time, due to the negligence of the Mogul administration, the Jats went far; constructed forts for themselves and having fully equipped themselves with firearms started highway robbery at the time of Aurangzeb who was busy in the Deccan campaign. On hearing that the Jats had revolted, he sent an army under the command of his grandson, Bedar Bakht, but the Rajput generals betrayed the young commander. (Irvine, William. (nd.). Later Moghul, Lahore., pp.296-297). During the reign of Farrukh Siyar (1712-1719) they again revolted, and during the time of Muhammad Shāh the Jats became even more rebellious. Suraj Mall, a Jat leader captured the city of Biana, which had been an important place of Muslim scholars and saints for the last seven hundred years. He forced all the Muslims to evacuate the city in humiliation. Even, finally, during the reign of Ahmad Shah Abdali, Safder Jang the governor of Oudh, revolted against the throne with the alliance of Suraj Mall, a rebel Jat leader, and raided old Delhi. All these deplorable situation created by the Jats have been mentioned in the letters to Abdali. Shāh Waliullah then mentioned the military strength of the Jats. He said that to shake their domination was not difficult. The people living under them were not happy with them because they had captured their agricultural land. Because of this if a powerful king came to their aid they would rise against tyrant Jat leader Suraj Mall. (Nizami. (1950)., pp.171-173). Besides, he gave a clear hint about the conspiracies of the Mogul nobles, the economic condition of India, the revenues of the country, the position of the trade and industry of the country and an overall condition of the Muslims in the country.

Having described the condition of the Muslims and all the up-rising Hindu tyrants, Shāh Waliullah appealed to Ahmad Shah Abdali to invade India in the following words:

“In this time there is no one except your Majesty (among Muslim rulers) who is sagacious and experienced in warfare, who commands power and authority and who could crush the infidel and hostile forces. Therefore, it is a duty incumbent upon your Majesty to march into India and crush the infidel (Maratha and Jats) domination and liberate the Muslims form the grips of non-Muslims. If, Allah forbade, the predominance of atheism (kufr) remains as such, the Muslims will disown Islam and it will not be possible for them to differentiate between Islam and kufr. It is also a great calamity; and there is none except you for the task of averting it. We appeal you in the name of Allah the Almighty to divert your attention to this affair and earn the glory of waging a holy war (Jihad fi Sabiillah) and rescue the Muslims from the hands of the unbelievers”.

(Nizami. (1950)., p.52).

While offering an invitation to Ahmad Shāh Abdali, Shāh Waliullah was highly conscious of the misery and destruction that might befall the Muslims during the invasion. He recalled the misfortune wreaked on Muslim India by Nadir Shah in 1739 who destroyed the Muslims and left the Marathas and the Jats intact. He believed that Nadir Shah’s invasion was a great cause to harm the Muslims of India.

He was afraid that if the same drama took place in India again then the Muslims would become still weaker and no trace of Islam would remain. Shāh Waliullah therefore, urged Ahamad Shah Abdali to take special care and accurate measures so that the Muslims living on his way to Delhi are not molested:

“When the mighty forces: he wrote to Abdali, “arrive at a place which has a mixed population of Muslims and Hindus, sufficient number of administrative officers should be appointed there with strict instructions so that they should transfer the weak people among the Muslims, living in small villages, to a town or a city. These towns are also be guarded by officials who should make sure that the property and the honour of the Muslims are not violated under any circumstances”. (Nizami. (1950)., pp.53-54):

Another important address of Shāh Waliullah’s letters had been made to Najibuddawlah (d.1770 A.D), a powerful Indian Rohila chief and the chief commander of the Mogul kingdom. He was a close friend of Shāh Waliullah and considered as a safeguard of Muslim orthodoxy in the subcontinent during post Aurangzeb period. (Nizami. (1950). Cf. Ghazi, ’Political Letters of Shāh Waliullah’, 83., p.90). Shāh Waliullah believed that Najibuddawlah was the person who had the courage for saving the Muslim rule from a total annihilation. Najibuddawlah successfully reigned Delhi from 1761-1770 and controlled the entire politics of Delhi. (Nizami, (1950), p. 62).

Out of a total of forty letters compiled by Nizami, seven have been addressed to Najibuddawlah. Apart from other details of their contents, certain points of the contemporary prevalent political situations of the country had also been clearly manifested in those letters. To be fair to him, it must be mentioned here that Shāh Waliullah did not ignore the safety of the non-Muslims. He was very conscious about it and his letters bore testimony to this effect that the safety of the non-Muslims was as dear to him as that of his own community. For instance in a letter to Najibuddawlah, urging him for taking measures for the protection of the people of Delhi he said:

“No wrong or mal-treatment be meted out to the city of Delhi. The people of Delhi have several times faced plunders of their wealth and property as well as dishonor and disgrace. That is why the realization of royal objectives has been delayed. For the cry of the oppressed do have its effects. This time if you want that the delayed works are done, you should strictly prohibit that no one is to tease or offend the Muslims and the dhimmis (non-Muslims) of Delhi”. (Nizami, (1950), p.232).

In another letter to Najibuddawlah, Shāh Waliullah urged him to determine his heart to make the word of Allah exalted, to strengthen the religion of the Prophet (SAAS), and to wage a Jihad against “these accursed people” i.e. the Jats and the Marathas. (Nizami. (1950)., p.25).

Shāh Waliullah successfully diagnosed the causes of the decline of the Muslims and the Muslim rule in India separately. He believed that the reason behind the decline of the Muslim society in India was Muslims’ drifting away from the real teachings of Islam, and the cause of the decline of the Mogul Empire were economic and administrative. He saw every section of the Muslim community, including ruling classes of India, leading a life of unwise and disordered economy. (Waliullah, (nd)., Tafhimat-i-Ilahiyya, Vol.I., pp.282-288). This he had expressed more clearly in a letter written to the Mogul king and his nobles. In this letter he made analytical examination of the government policies relating to the economy and administration. He suggested to the Mogul bureaucracy the following measures to be taken if they wanted to rectify what had gone wrong with the kingdom:

1. The Jat annoyance should be paid immediate attention. Their strongholds dotting the districts between Delhi and Agra should be destroyed. The rebellious Jats should be brought to complete subjugation.
2. The area of the Khalisa lands should be extended. The whole districts from the banks of the Ganges to the confines of Sirhind should be brought the direct control of the government. It should be borne in mind that the cause of the weakness of the state these days was due to lack of funds, which had resulted because the Khalisa lands had shrunk.
3. The practice of giving the Khalisa lands on lease should at once be stopped. The lands should be placed under the supervision of honest government officers. It should be noted that the practice of giving Khalisa lands on lease is extremely harmful to the state.
4. Jagirs should be given only to the high officials. Officials of lower grade should be paid in cash, as was done in the reign of Shah Jahan, because they (the lower graded officials) were unable to control the lands. They were therefore obliged to sub-lease their holdings and they often remained poor and inattentive to their official assignments.
5. The traitors should be deprived of their Jagirs and offices, so that the other people should learn a lesson and remain loyal in future.
6. New reforms should be introduced in the army. The following three proposals are recommended in this regard:
   i. The Darughas (police inspectors) should be appointed from among the people who are from noble lineage, courageous and compassionate and loyal to the king.
   ii. The people who have displayed shameful behavior in the recent turmoil should be sacked and other people should be enlisted in the army.
   iii. The soldiers should be paid in time, for if the payment of their salaries is delayed they are obliged to borrow money on credit. Thus a good portion of their income is wasted.
7. The office of the Qadi (Judge) should be given to those people who have never been charged with bribery.
8. The Imam of the mosques should be paid high salaries. Strict orders should be issued for the observance of prayers and the fasts of the month of Ramada.
The kings and his nobles should not indulge in unlawful enjoyment. They should repent for their past sins and refrain from committing any in future. (Muztar. (1979)., pp.160-162).

From these discussions, it is proved that the objectives, which inspired Shāh Waliullah in his actual life, were in total conformity with those he advocated in his writings. The most outstanding concern of his life seems to be the ascendency of the universal mission of Islam, which could not be realized according to him, without waging the Jihad. It is this supreme objective, which constitutes the raison d'etre of the socio-political organization of Muslim society, embodied in the agency of the Khilafa, in the opinion of Shāh Waliullah.

2.2.3.4 Significance of the Political Domination

In the political spheres, Shāh Waliullah’s main concern was to restore Muslim dominance in the government of India. To that end, he outlined a three-point programme:

First, the Muslims must rely on the military force to overcome their political adversaries, such as Jats and Marathas and others.

Secondly, the Muslim society in India must be structured in accordance with the early Islamic ideals.

Thirdly, the Muslims of the subcontinent must explore the possibility of inviting Muslim intervention from outside, if necessary. (Agwani, M.S. (1986). Islamic Fundamentalism in India. Delhi: Twenty First Century Indian Society., p.10., cf. Maktubat-i- Shāh Waliullah, Rampur, Ms.No.245).

Shāh Waliullah pointed out that one of the crucial conditions that led to the Muslim decline was that the real control of the government was in the hands of the Hindus. All the accountants and clerks were Hindus. The Hindus controlled the country’s wealth, while the Muslims were destitute. In a letter written to Ahmad Shah Abdali, Shāh Waliullah mentioned that, he was the only king with sufficient manliness, gallantry and foresight for the task of annihilating polytheism. It was therefore his religious duty to declare a Jihad and liberate the enslaved Muslims. Unless this was done, the Muslims would forget their religion and would be reduced to a state, which was half-Islamic and half-idolatrous. The letter concluded with the remark:

“We beseech you (Abdali) in the name of the Prophet to fight a Jihad against the infidels of this religion. This would entitle you to great rewards before Allah the Most High and your name would be included in the list of those who fought Jihad for His sake. As far as worldly gains are concerned, incalculable booty would fall into the hands of the Islamic Ghazis (triumphant) and the Muslims would be liberated from their bonds. The invasion of Nadir Shah who destroyed the Muslims left the Marathas and Jats secure and prosperous. This resulted in the infidels regaining their strength and in the reduction of the Muslim leaders of Delhi to mere puppets”. (Nizami. (1950)., No.2).

To me, Shāh Waliullah’s socio-political thought is a very systematic and rational. He tried to present Islam as a complete code of life, and hence, his utmost effort he had exerted in reconciling religion and politics as well as labored to establish a philosophy, which is neither dogmatic nor strict. As Saeeda Iqbal remarks: “The mixture of the Sufistic with the orthodox, lends color to the one and discipline to the other. (Iqbal, Saeeda. (1984)., p.126).

2.2.3.5 Revolution

Shāh Waliullah did not ignore revolution in such circumstance though he remarked it as a very distressful and hard job. In fact, he thought that, when the socio-political climate of the country goes corrupt to an extent that the development is debarred and the reformation by evolution is not possible, it becomes necessary to bring about a revolution. Shāh Waliullah remarked it as a cancer of the body, which needed to be removed. Shāh Waliullah said:

“A social institution under which people are deprived of their primary needs of life, is like an abscess in the body which the sooner removed the better it would be. The persons who know wherein lies the general welfare feel it as their bounded duty to bring about revolution. But it should be kept in mind that the bringing of revolution is a very distressful and hard job, as in addition to the sacrifice of life and property one has at times to part with his beloved country. Such sacrifices can be made by those who are very sincere, self-confident and have the ability and courage to face the situations, however, serious, with patience and endurance. For the working of such a revolution, sometimes, one has to struggle through protests, at times through raising slogans, etc., and on certain occasions he has to put up an actual fight. Whatever sacrifice is mad in this direction in reckoned the best of actions”. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.)., Vol.II, pp.48-49).

About the significance of revolution Shāh Waliullah’s view was very clear. As a reformist and revivalist he could not overlook it. He was revolutionary first and the n something else. In this regard he opined that “it must be borne in mind that mere talks, prayers and pious hopes cannot bring the revolution”. For that he said, people have to work ceaselessly and sometimes to undergo the hardship of exilement. But by revolution, Shāh Waliullah did not mean any untoward condition in the country; instead he meant what is a process to establish peach and prosperity in the country. He said:

“From of revolution which may bring peace and prosperity and not the one which may bring in its wake insecurity and chaos in the country”. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.)., Vol.II, p.171).

The substance of his teachings and philosophy is to break the old order and replace it by the new one, which may satisfy the requirements of the changing times. Until and unless the old order is substituted by the new progressive one, there will be no proper development in the various fields of life.

Shāh Waliullah said:

"……The Prophets who were sent by Allah the Almighty were revolutionaries. Had they not been revolutionaries," he urged, "there would have been no opposition to them. But, because they wanted to introduce the law, their people did not like this and they thus rose against them. The Prophet 'Isa, for instance, who was an emblem of mercy and kindness, had also enjoined upon his followers always to keep their swords sharp and ready for fight in self defense". (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.), Vol.II, pp.171-172. Also Tafhimat., Vol.II., p.160).

2.2.3.6 Jihad

According to Shāh Waliullah, the mark of the perfect implementation of the Shari‘ah, is the performance of jihad. It is for this reason that he emphasized the necessity of the continuation of jihad, and by jihad he generally meant revolution (inqilab). He strongly recommended the retention of the spirit of jihad for all times to come. So long as this spirit, he said, was present in the Muslims, they remained victorious and were honored everywhere, but the moment it disappeared from them, they were humiliated and hated wherever they were. He was of the opinion that in the existing times, the Muslims should in no way neglect the sacred duty of jihad as such neglect in turn amounts to the loss of abundant good. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.), Vol.II, p.171).

In order to show the superiority of jihad and its excellence, Shāh Waliullah, used to quote the Qur’anic verses and the Ahadith one after another. The perfect law, to him, is the one which commands its followers to perform jihad. Because, he argued, a law which does not make binding for its followers the jihad for the sake of Allah and the raising of His word will ultimately fail to bring the desired good and benefit for men. Bearing this in mind, he recommended that the Muslims should make their worldly life strong and prosperous and appealed to them to make themselves so strong military that the enemy’s sudden and unexpected attack be effectively repelled and its power completely crushed. For that he had been repeatedly advising in his works that full and adequate preparations for both defense and offence against aggression be made without loss of time. People should be given military training and made acquainted with the modern technique of warfare. They should be armed with the latest and the most sophisticated weapons of fight available in the world. The spirit of jihad should be infused in them, as without it such a nation could not survive for long. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.), Vol.II, p.171).

The modern interpretation of jihad ever emphasized its defensive character. To Shāh Waliullah, it does not only mean the actual fight with the enemy, but also making preparations in advance against all evils whether they are be social, economic, moral or political. This is the reason that he had been always encouraging people to launch a vigorous fight against the corrupt order and rotten society till the rule of justice is established. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.), Vol.II, pp.171-173).

Shāh Waliullah believes that the universal domination of Islam was not possible without jihad and by holding onto the tails of cows. Not only would this be humiliating but also it would make other religion more powerful. (Waliullah. (1378 A. H.), Vol.II, p.487).

Shāh Waliullah, however, did not mean by jihad that all the non-Muslims should be converted to Islam by sword. He was pessimistic about the real depth of faith of those converted by the sword. Such converts were hypocrites and on the Day of Judgment they would be thrown to the very deepest part of Hell, together with the infidels. (Waliullah. (1996)., p.327).

Islamisation by the sword, added Shāh Waliullah, did not remove doubts from the mind of newly converted Muslims and it was always possible that they might return to infidelity. He believed that Imam (here meaning rulers) should convince the people through rational argument. The superiority of Islam should be explained in positive terms and it should be brought home to converts that Islamic laws were perfectly clear and easy to follow. (Waliullah. (1996)., p. 258).

By the time of Shāh Waliullah’s death no power in the disintegrating Mogul Empire had been left to convert Hindus to Islam, but it would seem that the rising Baluch and Afghan Zamindars and the military adventures converted Hindus to Islam in their respective areas of influence. Shāh Waliullah’s son Shāh ‘Abdul ‘Aziz claims to have Islamized hundreds of Hindus. (Dehlawi, Shah ‘Abdul ‘Aziz. (1314/1896). Maltūzät-i-Shāh ‘Abdul ‘Aziz. Meerut., p.97). They might have been Hindus living between Palith and Delhi. However, the proselytism programme of Shāh Waliullah was confined to the leaders of the Hindu community, but it was not extended to the low class of the infidels. (Waliullah. (1996)., p.257).

2.2.4 Conclusion

Anyway, Shāh Waliullah did not establish a clear programme of active reform for his followers. His religious and political endeavors were aimed at the traditional elite. In the early nineteenth country, the grandson of Shāh Waliullah, Shāh Muhammad Ismail, strictly observed his grandfather’s system in his only major theoretical work, ‘Aqabat. With no viable Muslim ruler to turn to religious and social control, Shāh Waliullah and his followers could rely on the ultimate authority of Islamic scriptures together with their individual and collective with or effort in a time of historical change. As the spokesman for the Tariqat-i-Mhuammadiyyah, Shāh Muhammad Ismail used the intellectual system of Shāh Waliullah as the basis for a
